16 REVISITING THE ANALYSIS OF LITHIC REFITTED ARTEFACTS AT THE UPPER PALAEOOLITHIC SITES IN JAPAN: ITS POTENTIAL AND CHALLENGES

Takakura, Jun (Archaeological Research Centre, Hokkaido University)

Research at the Upper Palaeolithic sites in Japan has yielded a large number of lithic refitted pieces since the late 1960s and early 1970s. The importance of the analysis of lithic refitted artefacts has been emphasised as they provide essential insights into the study of lithic production technology and site formation process, leading to the reconstruction of human behaviours conducted at the sites. Such studies appeared at about the same time that the studies of Palaeolithic sites using lithic refitted artefacts began in western Europe. In this paper, I will review the history of the study of lithic refitted artefacts in the Palaeolithic sites of Japan and investigate what problems have been identified as challenges and what methods of analysis have been chosen to deal with these challenges. Through this review of research trend, the possibilities and problems of analysing the lithic refitted artefacts at the Upper Palaeolithic sites will be discussed.

17 RE-COMPOSING TIME AND SPACE: INTEGRATING LITHIC AND INTRA-SITE SPATIAL ANALYSIS WITH REFITTINGS. THE OPEN-AIR SITE OF MALGA STAULANZA (BELLUNO, ITALY)

Cecchetti, Marzio (Dipartimento di Studi Umanistici, Sezione di Scienze Preistoriche e Antropologiche, Università degli Studi di Ferrara, Ferrara, Italy) - Visentin, Davide (Dipartimento di Studi Umanistici, Sezione di Scienze Preistoriche e Antropologiche, Università degli Studi di Ferrara, Ferrara, Italy) - Bertola, Stefano (Dipartimento di Studi Umanistici, Sezione di Scienze Preistoriche e Antropologiche, Università degli Studi di Ferrara, Ferrara, Italy) - Fontana, Federica (Dipartimento di Studi Umanistici, Sezione di Scienze Preistoriche e Antropologiche, Università degli Studi di Ferrara, Ferrara, Italy)

The study and interpretation of open-air Palaeo-Mesolithic sites is often challenging, even when a solid excavation methodology is applied. Multidisciplinary analysis (e.g. geoarchaeology) may contribute to the identification of the post-depositional dynamics that occurred at the site. However, circumstances such as bioturbation can still limit the interpretation of the stratigraphic record. This is particularly true when dealing with “persistent places”, sites in which multiple occupations occurred over time. In these cases, the potential of refittings is even more evident as a tool to prove the consistency of the single assemblages within the total record.

In this communication, we present the case-study of Malga Staulanza (Belluno Dolomites, Italy), an open-air high-altitude site occupied during the Late Upper Palaeolithic (Late Epigravettian) and the Early Mesolithic (Sauveterrian). Considering the weak stratigraphic reliability due to soil formation processes and the low depositional rate of mountain environments, the high frequency of refittings was pivotal for a) the accurate identification of the exploited raw materials and b) the study of the lithic reduction sequences. The spatial information provided by the refitting assemblages also allowed us to confirm c) two spatially distinct areas of dispersion of the lithic artefacts, broadly corresponding to the two occupations and d) a major post-depositional disturbance (i.e. treefall) occurring between the two. Refittings strongly contributed to the general discussion of distinct chrono-cultural phases of the site, as well as the spatial organisation and taphonomy of the occupations. In conclusion, the analysis highlights the potential of refittings as a powerful tool for complementing traditional techno-economical and intra-site analysis for the reconstruction of the occupational and post-depositional dynamics of prehistoric sites.

18 RECONSTRUCTING SITE FORMATION PROCESSES THROUGH FAUNAL ANALYSIS AND REFITTING AT THE UPPER PALEOLITHIC AND MESOLITHIC SITE OF KOHLHAU-ABRI, SOUTHWESTERN GERMANY

Toniato, Giulia (State Office for Cultural Heritage of Baden-Württemberg, Germany) - Tafelmaier, Yvonne (State Office for Cultural Heritage of Baden-Württemberg, Germany)

Kohlhau-Abri is a rock shelter site located close to the Lone Valley, in Southwestern Germany. It was excavated between 2015 and 2018 yielding a thick stratigraphy spanning the Late Pleistocene to the Holocene. Preliminary analyses of the lithic remains have identified the presence of two cultural complexes pertaining to the Magdalenian and Mesolithic, with the Mesolithic assemblage displaying both Early and Late Mesolithic technological components. However, the study of the faunal assemblage provides a more nuanced picture around the history of the depositional and post-depositional processes that affected the distribution of the archaeological remains. Bone refitting allowed us to recognize the vertical and horizontal movement of some of the finds, and the presence of conjoined elements attributable to a large cervid species whose AMS 14C dates pertain to the Late Palaeolithic. Some of the bones also display anthropogenic marks providing possible evidence of human occupation during the Late Palaeolithic that is not clearly recognizable from the lithic artefacts. Our study highlights the importance of bone refitting as a valuable tool for disentangling the impacts of human activities from taphonomic processes, especially at sites with a high degree of post-depositional alteration.

19 CAN WE DO MORE WITH REFITS? SOME EXAMPLES FROM THE PLEISTOCENE/HOLOCENE TRANSITION IN BELGIUM

Vandendriessche, Hans (University of Ghent)

The benefits of refitting for our understanding of the lithic technological aspects of a specific industry or a time period are well known. Refitting first and foremost provides highly detailed information on the knapping methods used by prehistoric artisans. Besides that, by combining artefacts that were differently distributed across a site, vertically or horizontally, refitting also has the potential to provide information on the spatial aspects of lithic technology and on site taphonomy.

In this contribution, we use refit data from several Belgian sites situated at the Pleistocene/Holocene traditions (e.g. Ruien, Remouchamps, Kerkhove; Vandendriessche, 2022; Vandendriessche et al., 2023) to explore two main research topics: (1) How refitting can be used as an epistemological tool to increase our understanding of knapping methods at these sites, but also of the limitations of other types of technological analyses (quantitative attribute-based analyses, as well as schémas de lecture diacritique) with regards to the reconstruction of these methods; (2) How we can gain a better understanding of the systemic and post-depositional processes that impacted the spatial organization of the sites, by making use of refit line lengths and orientations, as well as refit dispersal rates and for example, movements of burned and non-burned lithic artefacts.

20 UNLOCKING THE STRUCTURE OF A MESOLITHIC OPEN-AIR SITE THROUGH REFITTING: A CASE FROM GAILIŪNAI 2, SE LITHUANIA

Gaižauskas, Lukas (Lithuanian Institute of History)

Refitting of lithic finds, while very common in research of Palaeolithic contexts, is not as often applied in the studies of Mesolithic sites. The usefulness of refitting is especially limited in the research of Stone Age sites in the South Eastern Baltic, where unstratified archaeological layers formed as a result of multiple occupation episodes are usually found and where lithics from just one raw material type predominate. One recently excavated site Gailiūnai 2, located in SE Lithuania and dated to the mid 7th millennium BC, departs from this stereotype as it was found to represent the remains of a single-period hunter gatherer camp. The site contains a shallow archaeological layer that was not significantly disturbed by later post-depositional processes. Despite scant knapping activities carried out on the site and the minute nature of debitage, the application of refitting has allowed to reconstruct many links between flint artefacts found within debitage clusters. In particular, refitting results have been useful as an indication of the intensity and frequency of activities carried out on the site that would be difficult to assess using a different approach. The predominantly small refit sets indicate limited, possibly task-oriented knapping at the site. It seems that knapping products – blades and their fragments were carried away from the site as well as brought from outside and discarded. Data from refitting was complemented by findings of spatial analysis and use-wear analyses on lithic remains found at the site. From these multiple lines of evidence a case could be made for Gailiūnai 2 to have been a short-term, occasionally revisited campsite. The approach used in the case of this particular site sheds more light on the residential mobility patterns of local small Mesolithic hunter-gatherer communities and would be much more difficult at many contemporary sites.

301 WHAT IS A VILLAGE? COLLECTIVE ACTION, SETTLEMENT PATTERNS AND RURAL COMMUNITIES

Session theme: 4. Persisting with Change: Theory and Archaeological Scrutiny

Session organisers: Quirós Castillo, Juan Antonio (University of the Basque Country; University College London) - Eva Svensson, Eva (Karlstad University)

Session format: Regular session

The study of settlement patterns has been one of the major topics of rural archaeological studies from the beginning of the discipline. As a result, the definition of different categories based on the shapes of the sites, the study of creations, transformations and desertions of villages, hamlets, farms and other domestic spaces, or the analysis of the social and political impact of these trends have played a relevant role in the comprehension of rural landscapes. What is more, villages and other rural settlements have provided the bases for macroscale (landscapes studies) and microscale analysis (household studies, church archaeology, funerary archaeology), etc.
